

When we estimate something using statistics, usually that estimate comes with uncertainty. Take, for example, election polling. When we get a polled percentage of voters that favor a candidate, we were only able to sample a small subset of voters. Therefore, our estimate has uncertainty associated with it.

Confidence intervals are a convenient way to communicate that uncertainty in estimates.